Navigation in a Digital World

This short TIKI review was part of a 4 page article about PC navigation software where TIKI was presented side by side with well known programs like Nobeltec , MaxSea and Mapttech Chart Navigator

In my search for nav software, I discovered a couple of lesser known programs. Norwegian sailor and programmer Fred Jenssen wrote the TIKI Navigator Pro software, and it's obvious that he's pretty good at both disciplines.

What I especially liked about TIKI was the ability to purchase the software online and to download it immediately. TIKI only supports raster charts, and it doesn't receive AIS or weather GRIBS, but for the price, you get a lot of features and an especially friendly interface, perfect for newcomers to navigation software.

Loading TIKI was easy, and the program looked for charts on the hard drive automatically. It did not take long at all to figure out how to set courses and waypoints.

I can see how TIKI has become a favorite low-cost navigation solution for many loyal users.
